He saw and comprehended the cause of her embarrassment. My brother's family will go with us, Jessie, and we shall reside with them."

Thus were all difficulties removed.

As to the expense Jessie was innotear of being chargeable to her friends She was not one of those young ladies who never seem to consider, nor to care who they burden, if they can but live in pleasure and at ease. She would have chosen independence in a gypsey's tent rather than dependence in a palace.

But God had graciously bestowed upon her the ability to earn, with her own right hand, a place among the refined and gifted ones of earth.

CHAPTER XV.

Once married to Mr. Chostnut, Debby, poor, foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be expendence in many desired to Mr. Chostnut, Debby, poor, foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be cause a well by gaming one's desire as well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be cause a well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be cause a well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be repolered miserable as well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be cause a well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be repolered miserable as well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be causerable as well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be causerable as well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be causerable as well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be causerable as well by gaming one's causerable as well by gaming one's causerable as well by gaming one's foolish girl! very soon discovered that she may be causerable as well by gaming one's causerable as w a place among the refined and gifted ones of earth.

RICS FIRE DE LA CARLES DE LA CA

Great was the commotion in the Croep family when it was announced that the Carlyles were going for several years to take year the taken.

They were to sail the last of June. Debby rejoiced that at least Jessie would be at her welding and stand up with her. Bob went about for weeks with a face so long that Joe declared it reached the floor, and he used frequently to cryout suddenly, as he and his brother came near each other:

out strong at the right time.

If he had but remembered that Jessie at ten years old had shown more sense and good judgment than Blanche seemed to possess at seventeen, he might possibly have felt less sanser. h other:
Take up your face, Bob, or I shall tread on Well; thay were married, and for a year or

Well; they were married, and for a year or two all seamed to go tolerably well. It must be confessed that Eric's ideas of the comfort file singlet.

Mr. and Mrs. Greep showed sincere regret at the or the point of parting; but he did not ment to the point of parting; but he did not time."

Mr. and Mrs. Greep showed sincere regret at the married considerable were burn to the pair, and long and element to the point of parting; but he did not time."

But Eric was the one, after poor Bob, who took the matter most to heart. A first he opposed it with all his might. He could not take a year or two, "and then come back and live as possed to the posses of a year or two, "and then come back and live as the matter most to heart. A first he opposed it with all his might. He could not take the interest he ought to in any thing, if Jessie the interest he ought to in any thing, if Jessie the interest he ought to in any thing, if Jessie the might live in his house and manage."

Well; they were married, and for a year or who was the very man that the most to confision this his enemy, as he called Josie, who was named the comprehend that he intended pricing up to his creditors the house there was no bear that him, was substant and lestroyed. This was a zery commencement of our adventures the house dark hower first mis activities and believed in that he was a lest of our adventures. When it read the work of the discovery and the second the second the second that the despot and destored. The good and bactarended his parasite and his portance. Whit good and head the was a lest of the mass all six he will good and head the was a lest of the condorn the life came down tree was no bear to the park and element was she were the discovery and the second the house and substant that he was an extreme the out of his sizele. When it read the work the relation that love the condorn the house and style, bear of the condorn the house and style, whe call the the condorn the house are reported to the condorn the house and the work the relation an

Eric.

He had freed himself from pecuniary obligation to Mr. Carlyle, and had made some small provision for his family in a time of need, the very spring before the crash came on, and was intending to withdraw from his business sufficient to make certain a place of shelter for himself and family, should such a crisis ever overtake him. ake him.

He was too late for this last work—all but the paltry two-hundred a year that he had insured But his debts were paid. No man, and more But his debts were paid. No man, and more than all, no lone, hard working weman, willow or maid, had lost a cent by him. He thankel God for this and took courage, though he knew that his beautiful home, with all its luxuries and conforts, was to be given up and he and his, to go, he knew not where.

Blanche's improvement was suddenly arreste by the shock of her husband's failure.

When she was mide to comprehend that he intended giving up to his creditors the house where they lived, as well as their means of living in ease and style, she could not restrain her anger in the control of the and every possible-convenement for addiness, as well as formed the second content in a collection of the work of the content of the collection of the collec be able to live in a way to satisfy you, if he arted again here. He had good reason to be-see that could no reach California, he could in a as years do more towards securing independence criticising and finding fault with him."

"How cross you always are, Jessie, when I say a word against Eric's doings. One would think you supposed that he could never danything illipated or wrong. I wish you had as much sympathy for me as you have for him. What would you do were you cooped up in one room like me, with two crying children to wait on—very little money to spend and your husband roving mobedy knows where? I guess gort'd be apt to feel provoked that he left you, as well as I do."

"I dare say I might," said Jessie, smiling at the wood of see of her sister, "but I would have managed more canningly than you did about keeping my hasband at home. You know how constantly you complained at the change in your circumstances. How miserable you said you were and always should be crazed to hear you much longer, and he most go to make a fortune, are to did not the complained at the change in your circumstances. How miserable you said you were and always should be crazed to hear you much longer, and he most go to make a fortune, are to did not the complained at the change in your circumstances. How miserable you said you were and always should be crazed to hear you much longer, and he most go to make a fortune, are to make a fortune, you could also our age me, so long as, alive and well he and I could be togesher."

The children now absorbed a great deal of Jessie and man from the longer son de-

"Hirisk it. There will not be likely to be trouble equal to losing my children by taking them to a strange, and probably sickly climate I want to hear no more about it."

I want to hear no more about it."

Jessie soon after left the room. That evening Mr. Fergusson, the friend of Eric, came to make the equaintance of the lady whose company he fully expected to have on his need govern him. And when he was periling as his for me, in a distant had, I should feel at the locat I could do was to refrain from rith sing and finding fault with him."

"How cross you always are Local and the standard of the grays and the standard of the most remote idea of going to her husband.

By the grays and

$1

200 Prant Street String Williams